Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from An Eight-Hours Day: The Case Against Trade-Union and Legislative Interference The cordial reception given to my little book on Picketing in September last has induced the compilation of this summary of a still more important phase of the labour question. The present volume is really a series of notes, so placed as to form, it is hoped, a readable handbook, and drawn up chiefly with the desire of deliberately giving a definite expression of opinion on the subject, but, at the same time, not excluding fair statements of arguments of other sides of the question. It is hoped that the undercurrent of bias bears with it a clear indication that we favour such a voluntary reduction of the hours of labour as considerations for national prosperity and the welfare of every individual concerned will permit; in fact, as Professor Marshall puts it, that a general reduction of the hours of labour is likely to cause a little net national loss and much moral good. But State interference and trade-union compulsion cannot be too strongly condemned. There is no lack of illustration to show that hitherto voluntary effort has been thoroughly satisfactory. Many experiments have been attempted, either through the personal feeling, the generosity, the sense of duty, or the business interest of the employer, or at the honourable initiative of the employed to secure for themselves more leisure, more healthy conditions of working, or higher wages.
