Those tones which are easily affected are called negative, or, better, passive colors. The tones not found in the spectrum (namely, white, the grays, and black) may be called the passive colors, and those tones found in the spectrum may be called the active colors. But these are relative terms also, for some of the spectrum colors are more active than others, and tints and shades sometimes receive qualities as readily as grays. Drill Exercises. --Have pupils select from papers and other colored objects a warm green and a cool green, a warm blue and a cool blue, a warm violet and a cool violet, etc. Compare the greens of leaves, the violets of asters, etc. Compare the grays of tree trunks, of pebbles, of clouds.
